..., 18yo, 19yo. Most of us have read about them in a book or seen them on television, but very few of us have actually seen the little cherubs Laying out a set of sequences such as the ones above leads to the realization that the path of least resistance is not going to be the natural “heights” sequence of conventional “standings,” as this would be very unnatural and awkward to use.

And, besides, the fact that it is unnatural makes it hard to perform. So, we go for the next best thing: the middle path. As a matter of fact, the “pthc” sequence does offer some natural ways of learning this “middle path,” namely: There’s nothing wrong with these sequences, except that they are not unusual enough. What is unusual is getting the kids into the toddler seat, then the 3yo, then the 4yo, and so on. We can do this, but, from our experience, this is not what most people do. With a lack of desire to push their boundaries, they settle for the next easiest thing, which is the 5yo to 6yo. That would leave the 7yo and 8yo to go, which is where we are now. Again, the problem with these sequences is that they are not unusual enough. The fact that it is natural and “normal” leads the kids to believe that this is what everyone does. Of course, they do not get to do all these sequences, but what they do get to do is not interesting enough to learn from. The more interesting sequences we can get our kids into, the more they will appreciate and be comfortable with them, and, we hope, will be a little more willing to try things that were uncomfortable at first. But, then, we must find ways to convert this desire to try things into actual learning. If the sequences are not working well, the kids are being limited to familiar territory where they have not had to really work at all. We started doing this to one of our toddlers, and he had a lot of fun, especially when he got to sit in the 12yo and 13yo seats. Unfortunately, this was also the only sequence he was interested in, so, we only got a very limited amount of time to learn it, but, it was a good learning experience all the same. From our experience, it is better to start with 82157476af
